Piccards Prepare For Stratosphere Flight

Henry Ford (left) wishes Dr. and Mrs. Jean Piccard good luck on their proposed flight to the stratosphere from Detroit. Looking through a porthole in the gondola is Prof. W. F. G. Swann of Franklin Institute, Swarthmore, Pa. The Piccards' first attempt to take off was postponed because of high winds.

Screen Reflections

AT THE WHITNEY
Double Feature
★★ "GIRL IN DANGER" and "FUGITIVE ROAD"

The double feature at the Whitney offers little more than the ordinary in the way of entertainment in the show that opened yesterday. You can't say that the shows are actually bad, but they're still far from good. Both pictures are of the usual type that have no outstanding talent in the cast. You expect little, and usually get it.

"Girl in Danger," is a bit far fetched when it has a bored society miss get mixed up with a bunch of gangsters, but in the end law and order win out, and she falls in love with the chief of detectives, who gets both his man and the girl.

Ralph Bellamy is the one and only detective, while Shirley Grey is the down on the world young thing, from that group which the newspapers delight in calling the "smart young set."

"Fugitive Road" is two days and a night spent on the border of Austria by an American gangster, a Hungarian maid, and the commander of the post, a role carried out exceedingly well by Eric Von Stroheim.

The commander is rather proud of his prowess with the members of the fairer sex, and the arrival of such a delightful young miss as Wera Engels is a signal for his return to his more or less amorous ways. To save the situation, a to be reformed American gunman steps in, and the outcome is so obvious that you can never guess.

The action is rather slow, and at times even tends to drag. The plot is little better, and about the only redeeming feature is the work of Eric Von Stroheim.
