NEW ART CATALOGUE.

The Museum of Art Now Systematically Catalogued.

A Long Felt Want Supplied.—Our Art Collection no Longer an Unsolved Puzzle—The New Catalogue a Book Well Worthy of Possession.—More Interest Should be Taken in Our Art Museum.

In 1876, for the first time, a small catalogue of about eighty pages was published by the University containing a list of the statues and paintings in the library. Its author was Prof. Henry S. Freize, then curator of the museum.

The catalogue was divided into four parts. Part first contained an account of the engravings, photographs, chromo-lithographs and paintings. Part two was devoted to scripture. Part three to models and engravings of miscellaneous and antique objects, and part four to gems and medallions.

Since the publication of this catalogue it was found necessary to add a supplement, which should give a list of the works of Randolph Rogers and of the other valuable works and paintings that had beed added.

Since this supplement has been published, several works of art have been added, and a revision of the old catalogue was thought necessary. This has been accomplished in a very satisfactory manner by Prof. Martin L. D'Ooge, now curator of the museum.

The new catalogue is smaller and much more convenient than the old one. Bound in blue and illustrated it makes a book well worthy of possession. It is divided into parts after the manner of the old catalogue. The frontis-piece is a representation of Sophodes, the Greek tragic poet. This is from the original of Greek marble in the Lateran Museum in Rome, and by critics is considered the finest draped statue of a male figure ever discovered. The second of the eight illustrations in Laocoon group, presented to the University by the class of '59. This is from a group in marble in the Vatican and found among the ruins of Titus on the Esquiline.

The third illustration is that of Apollo Belvedere in the act of watching an arrow recently discharged. This is also from the original in marble in the Vatican, and was found in Antrim near the end of the fifteenth century. When the left hand and wrist were gone, but have since been restored by Montorsoli.

The picture of Niobe and her youngest daughter represents Niobe clasping her youngest child with her right hand, and trying to protect her with her mantle in her left from the invisible arrows of Diana and Apollo. This is probably the work of Scopas or of Praxitiles, who flourished in the fourth century, B. C.

The next, and by far the most valuable piece of art in the gallery is Blind Mydia, the "flower girl" of Pompeii. Mydia is represented as leaning upon her staff, eagerly listening for a sound of the friends from whom she has just been separated. This copy in Cararra marble was made by Randolph Rogers ie 1860, and presented to the University by the public spirited citizens of Ann Arbor.

The Lost Pleiad Merope, another of Rogers' works, separated from her sisters as a penalty of marrying Sisyphus, is represented as gazing earnestly for her sisters.

Lewis Cass, from the bronze statue by Daniel C. French, in the rotunda of the capital at Washington, and Juno completes the list of illustrations. As yet the gallery is not renumbered to comform with the catalogue, but it is expected that this will be done as soon as possible.

Our first season under the regime of the Northwestern Inter-collegiate Athletic Association was opened here last Saturday by the football game between the elevens of the University of Michigan and the University of Wisconsin. The Michigan boys carried off the honors of the day by a score of 10 to 6, but it was only after a hard fought battle. The game was well played by both sides and was as closely contested as any game that has been seen here for some time. Michigan's victory was due principally to the fine playing of Jewett, their right half, and to the support they rendered by their excellent blocking and tackling. The latter point was tne one in which the U. W. boys showed a lack of training.—The Daily Cardinal.
